Colonel William B. Ostlund, U.S. Army

During its 15 months in Afghanistan, the 2d Battalion (Airborne), 503d Infantry Regiment, spent 90 percent of its time training the Afghan National Security Forces (ANSF), connecting the population to its government, and improving infrastructure.

10 Exploiting Insurgent Violence in Afghanistan

Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Brouns, U.S. Army

We need to energize and empower ordinary Afghans to help extinguish the fire in Afghanistan.

Captain Chad M. Pillai, U.S. Army

Provincial reconstruction teams and tactical military units can devise affordable programs that can significantly reduce the illiteracy rate in Afghanistan.

26 Rethinking IED Strategies: From Iraq to Afghanistan

Commander John Moulton, U.S. Navy

If they view IEDs as murder weapons left at the scene of a crime rather than landmines placed to inhibit maneuver, coalition forces will reap intelligence on IED networks through forensic analysis.

34 Afghanistan's Nangarhar Inc: A Model for Interagency Success

Major David K. Spencer, U.S. Army

To be successful in the War on Terrorism, we must duplicate the level of U.S. interagency cooperation that created the Nangarhar Inc brand in Afghanistan.

41 The Israeli Defense Forces Response to the 2006 War with Hezbollah

Matt M. Matthews

The Israeli Defense Force has proved adept at identifying and analyzing its mistakes and miscalculations. One need look no further than the 2008 Gaza conflict to affirm its success in this endeavor.

52 Detainee Healthcare as Part of Information Operations

Lieutenant Colonel Beverly D. Patton, U.S. Army

The dissemination of positive messages about the medical care of detainees in Iraq can further U.S. political goals.

59 Understanding Innovation

Colonel Thomas M. Williams, U.S. Army Reserve

In contemporary usage, the word "innovation" is now just a common buzzword used to sell everything from software to blenders. Understanding what it means for a bureaucratic institution like the Army will help achieve it.

68 Future Strategic Environment in an Era of Persistent Conflict

Major Paul S. Oh, U.S. Army

The challenges of the next 20 years are immense and diverse. The U.S. military must be flexible and multi-talented.

80 How to End the Genocide in Darfur and Why It Won't Happen

Midshipman Brendon J. Mills, U.S. Naval Academy

The Pentagon is unlikely to spend precious time and resources on genocide prevention in Darfur because the violence there does not pose a threat to U.S. national security.

87 Misguided Intentions: Resisting AFRICOM

Captain Moussa Diop Mboup, Sengalese Army; Michael Mihalka, Ph.D.; and Major Douglas Lathrop, U.S. Army, Retired

AFRICOM should renounce its usual bilateral strategy and focus on collaboration with African institutions lest they see our rhetoric of "democracy" as a modern-day version of the "white man's burden."

93 Leveraging Liminality in Post-Conflict Security Sector Reform

Major Louis P. Melancon, U.S. Army

If the decision to leverage liminality is appropriate in security sector reform, caution should also be part of the plan.

INSIGHTS

99 The Role of Empathy in Irregular Warfare

Major John Bauer, U.S. Army

A single rule serves as a useful guideline for building legitimacy, "Treat the population as you would want yourself to be treated."

102 The School of Advanced Military Studies: An Accident of History

Brigadier General Huba Wass de Czege, U.S. Army, Retired

In this, the 25th year since its inception, SAMS needs to recalibrate its focus on operational art.

108 Terrorists: Neither Soldiers nor Criminals

Amitai Etzioni

Conventional armies that adhere to the rules of war when confronting terrorists are disadvantaged and under pressure to circumvent the rules. Conditions suggest work is needed to modify and update the law of land warfare.

119 Field Hospital Support for Civilians in Counterinsurgency Operations

Colonel Albert R. Bryan, U.S. Army Reserve, Retired

Medical support of civilians in an area of operations can be a tool for counterinsurgency. It is time to change the doctrine.
